To the Admissions Committee,

I am pleased to recommend Kavish Chapra, whom I taught in IGCSE Economics beginning in 2022. Over that time he grew from a newcomer to the subject into one of the most perceptive economics students in his cohort, someone drawn less to memorizing diagrams than to interrogating what those diagrams assume and where they break down. From early on, it was clear that he treated economics as a way of making sense of how people and societies actually behave, rather than as a collection of curves to reproduce on an exam.

Economics was unfamiliar to Kavish when he joined my class, yet he advanced quickly and held a place among the top students throughout. His written work was clear and purposeful, but its real distinction lay in interpretation. Rather than applying models mechanically, he wanted to know why a framework held, under what conditions it might fail, and what it quietly assumed about the people inside it. That instinct made his essays more thoughtful than most.

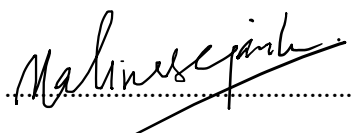
One discussion has stayed with me. During a lesson on demand and supply, Kavish drew on his experience at Annalakshmi, a pay-as-you-wish non-profit restaurant, to describe how social norms, perceived fairness, and group dynamics shaped contributions far more than price signals did. He explained that what people chose to give was often guided by a sense of what felt right in the moment and by the behaviour of those around them, considerations a purely price-based account struggles to capture. His observation turned the class toward the limits of rational-choice assumptions and revealed an early, genuine interest in behavioural economics, along with a willingness to bring lived experience into the room and test it against theory.

He contributed this way throughout the year, listening closely to classmates and posing questions that reframed a problem so others could see it more clearly. When we contrasted developed and developing economies, he pressed on institutional differences, doubting whether one model could yield the same outcomes across very different societies, though never as a way of dismissing the models themselves. His independent reading regularly enriched these exchanges and will let him contribute to any rigorous academic community.

Kavish carried the same reliability into his responsibilities outside class. As House Secretary for the Sports House, which I oversee, he was organized, dependable, and trusted with real responsibility, following through on what he took on without needing to be chased. He worked well with both staff and peers, and colleagues relied on him for tasks that required steadiness and discretion.

What I value most in Kavish is his judgment. He engages ideas with care, sits comfortably with ambiguity instead of forcing tidy conclusions, and treats feedback as a tool for sharpening how he thinks. He is honest about the limits of his own understanding, which is precisely what allows it to keep deepening. Among the economics students I have taught in recent years, he is one of the strongest, particularly in his ability to connect theory to the social contexts where it actually plays out. He has my sincere recommendation.

Warm regards,



Madam Nalinasegari Periasamy
(H/P: 012 319 8309)
Senior Teacher
Economics Department
Wesley Methodist School Kuala Lumpur (International)